They could also wage war on their own, a right definitely not available to their English counterparts.

About Britain No 7 North Wales the Marches by Geoffrey Grigson

By 1403 Glyndwr had once again united Wales and effectively evicted the Normans, and he set about establishing the country as a sovereign independent state, signing treaties of alliance with France and Spain. By 1282 Llewelyn the Last had been killed and Edward I had effectively conquered the whole of Wales.

However, there will no doubt be the same rivalries, passion and level of competition between the teams and the same support for the national team from fans at home. But that bald statement ignores some of the complexities of the situation. Hundreds of small were built in the border area in the 12th and 13th centuries, predominantly by Norman lords as assertions of power as well as defences against Welsh raiders and rebels.
