But he also made more significant investments for the welfare of the village: 350 yen toward the construction of the new village office in 1914 around a third of the total budget, 300 yen for the establishment of a telephone network in 1928, and 50 yen toward road repairs in the hamlet of Shida in 1932. Shikashi, kanojo wa modotte kite ikinokottanode. In the absence of any evidence, it is difficult to know whether the heads of the Yoshida, Yoshizaki, and Ogata households continued to support this purer version of Chōshū revolutionary ideology or whether they came to terms with the realist policy that led to military success in 1866—1869.
