Internationalising Higher Education

As student mobility has increased, universities have naturally developed relationships with each other. It has its roots way back in Ancient Egypt, Ancient Greece, Roman empire etc.

Internationalising higher education

Much of the internationalisation literature is written in Western and often Anglophone contexts which can lead to a preoccupation with the benefits for Western universities without considering the impacts on non-Western countries and their students.

Internationalising Higher Education

Our work in higher education and research looks to enhance global education and promote global citizenship.

Internationalising Higher Education

In addition, more research is required to achieve a better understanding of the phenomenon, its modes of operation and expansion and all of its consequences.

Internationalising Higher Education

What behaviours did you exhibit? We are used to considering our students living and working in regional or national contexts. Read more about our work in Afghanistan below. It also exposes the different stakeholders to various communities of practices, all of which should ultimately lead to better global citizenship.

Internationalising higher education

Our expertise, experience and worldwide networks help partners achieve their goals in internationalising higher education. Explicitly inviting students to discuss this, perhaps in pairs, can be a good way to begin the processes of intercultural exchange.

Launch of Internationalising Higher Education Framework Guide

Well, you need to define first, challenges for who? It is really about the global and interconnected society we are living in.

Internationalising higher education for a better world

Everything must therefore be done to help it achieve greater social and societal excellence. To discern the future of international higher education, several methods can be used, whether they relate to prediction, forecasting or prognosis. For detailed information on each service, please visit our country page on the British Council Services for International Education Marketing website.
