The Discourse of Race in Modern China

Translation seems to be that part of our work where we negotiate and discharge responsibility to both the academic community and those outside that community. Review Essay Reviewed by Barbara Mittler MCLC Resource Center Publication Copyright February 2007 Much of the standard story on print culture and the press in China needs to be reconsidered. The paper explores how fuyao, as an anomaly meant to convey historical evaluation, is constructed and understood in relation to historical personages who have been condemned because of their perceived violation of gendered political norms.
