This is not explained in an afterword or introduction. They wanted to arm men, women, and children on the mainland to at least make the US suffer.

The Rising Sun: The Decline & Fall of the Japanese Empire, 1936

Toland apparently interviewed a very large number of people and read first-hand accounts and so is able to reconstruct many individual talks, even with the Emperor himself, putting the reader in the Imperial throneroom as Hirohito consults with his ministers, and then in telegraph offices where communiques are sent from embassies back to Washington. A thick blanket of snow already covered the city and there was threat of more to come. It is not hard to follow because it written in a narrative voice projecting the views thoughts and words of those who fought, both Americans and Japanese.

The rising sun : the decline and fall of the Japanese Empire, 1936

The Allies triumphant victory followed.

The Rising Sun by John Toland, First Edition

A truly great cultural nation in the first requisite.
