They ignore a nude and bandaged boy in the pool beside them, as well as a man tied to a chair being attacked by three chickens and a man emerging from a tiger skin beside the pool. Is it not an impossible experience? She is raising the voices of women in art and in general and showing life and experiences from their point of view. And yet, despite once being infamous around the world, Leonor Fini is all but forgotten these days.

The fantastic results from this capacity to suggest, in the appearance of something, its opposite. Whilst the likes of Georges Bataille and theorized such underbelly interests and formally defined them as 'base materialism', the importance of living surrounded by one's own mortality was for Fini, as well as for Carrington, and Remedios Varo, simply an individual reality which they had all reached intuitively. She is a strong symbol for sexuality but also for mind and body.

Already well read and versed in psychoanalytic theory, Fini refused to be submissive or subordinate to men. Here though, during the last months of calm before the onset of wartime chaos, the power of three women is considered. Sphinxes had already been revived since ancient times, depicted in the 19th-century symbolist works of the Belgian painter, Fernand Knopff.
