The first of these appeared on the title page of the student magazine The Dartmouth in January 1869, but soon many more followed, on stationery, books, and cards. A consensus exists that the seal was engraved by one Nathaniel Hurd of Boston, 'a preeminent early American craftsman,' unfortunately nothing as definite can be said about who exactly designed it. While called to the second parish church of Lebanon, Connecticut, in the 1740s, Wheelock accepted natives for private tutoring in his own home, one of whom, a Mohegan named Samson Occum, proved an excellent student and subsequently became a Congregational minister himself.

The drypoints were printed by hand from copper plates and were hand colored on Echizen Shikibu Gampi paper by the artist. If Wheelock did design the seal it shows a progression in his relationship with the English Trust, from one of flattery to one of deception, while at the same time exhibiting a desire to one-up the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. The Trust members, however, were not fooled by Wheelock's attempt at flattery.
