He was a son of the lower-class samurai who died 40 years old in 1872.

Tanka 10 by Masaoka Shiki

In the past, many Japanese haiku masters were monks and just to mention the most famous Japanese poet, Matsuo Basho is known to have studied Zen in Edo with Butcho, a Zen Buddhist monk, so it is easy to find references to religion in their works. Or can we honestly assess—and if necessary, reject—weaker poems by even the best English-language haiku poets among us, and those of our recent past? Senryu also came out of renga and renku, and was also a device of poets to poke fun at hokku and haiku poets, as well as politicians of course. What goes in must come out.
