Health education in Africa: 1975

This paper reviews the past and current activities of bilateral, multilateral organizations and private donors in education aid, examines their effectiveness, discusses major problems in implementing educational programmes and suggests ways to improve aid in education.

Samuel P. Huntington

Second, preventive health care spending in developing countries is often found to account only for a negligible share of total expenditure. A number of multilateral and bilateral agencies were established around this time to implement various types of aid programmes; however, their effectiveness is constantly being questioned and challenged due to a variety of problems.

Samuel P. Huntington

There are, however, some caveats: First, identifying the direction of causality in this relationship is, once again, challenging. Initially, therefore, any organization experimenting with scenario planning needs some sort of a template, a primer or step-by-step approach to moving from scenarios to strategy. As a whole, the studies from Table point to the conclusion that increases in GDP per capita are associated with reductions in mortality in low- and middle-income countries.
