Eastern Africa Jesuits

Following the Haitian Slave Revolt, the movement for abolition gained momentum leading to the abolition of the Transatlantic Slave Trade. Primitive communalism is still practiced by some hunting and gathering and pastoral societies in Africa. The Fellahin was exploited to produce revenue and surpluses to the landlords.

African Social Hierarchy Chart

Her analysis is thus centred on demonstrating that the same basic difference exists between the types of evolution that developed in Africa and in Asia. Whatever the importance of unequal exchange, discussed by Catherine Coquery-Vidrovitch, which operated to the advantage of the aristocracies - 'peaceful commercial transactions which ensured the monopolizing of products at rates lower than their value' - it seems to us that that could at most act to consolidate or weaken the internal relations of production without being responsible for the formation of those relations.

East African Meteorological Society

The contradictory development of class society was to lead to the appearance of the state in its role as preserver of the interests of the dominant classes. The most famous member of this system of cultivation was the coffee, but one of the most useful plants was the sorghum, a grain from arid soil; teff was everywhere in the region.
