William Blackwood

However much deference I might have shown to any request or any arrangement which the author might have proposed to me in a proper manner, yet you will not wonder that now I will not give up any claims or compensation I may think myself entitled to, nor will I allow myself or my rights, even by Him, to be trampled upon, as I conceive has been attempted to be done by this unwarrantable publication.

This is a reproduction of a book published before 1923. It was the first attempt to present Knox in the light of a statesman as well as a divine, and to estimate justly if too favourably his real influence upon Scotland. Her son William never failed day by day to pause at his mother's door as he went to and returned from his business, bringing her the news, consulting her on all that occurred, filling the monotony of the days of old age with a constant thread of happy anticipation, and pleasant moments of confidential talk.

It is an awful moment. No doubt he would play golf now and then in a foursome on the Bruntsfield Links, which were then free and open ground, not restrained and limited by any girdle of villas.

The editors could have nothing to say against Mr Blackwood's resolution, for it had been fully provided for in the original agreement; but they kept up a lengthened wrangle over the edition to be published of the last remaining numbers, arguing that there should be only a sufficient number printed to supply the subscribers, and suggesting that the publisher might, if left unfettered, print 20,000 as easily as 2000, and so swamp their possible profits altogether. In place, therefore, of saying what I think upon the subject, I shall tell you what the author says to me. Yet we have to remember that new generations who know not Joseph are arising every day, and that what everybody knows begins after the lapse of very nearly a century to become a very vague and general knowledge.

The two writers may, however, be now said to occupy a very similar level, and there are very few names which can be placed beside them. Blackwood had requested, with some urgency, that he might have permission to send the manuscript on to London.

I have only again to express my regret at what has taken place, and to beg you will communicate this to the author in any way you may think proper. I recollect, for my own part, to have received letters from Mr John Blackwood which would have made the use of strong language very consolatory; though after a little consideration they were generally found to be worthy of much more serious thought. There is no trace of anything of the kind in the calm days of the beginning century.

Mrs Blackwood, though she always disliked my having any connection with the Ballantynes, rather thinks we should wait a few weeks longer till we see what is produced.
