An Angel at my Table book by Janet Frame

Cinema Papers: Where does that originate? It follows Janet's memories of her young to middle adult life. Eventually I'd work my way through this and could feel some sense of accomplishment. The fictional account of her life in the sanatorium may be poetic and riveting, but this autobiography was too detailed and dull and contained next to nothing of that period in her life.

An Angel at my Table

The third volume, The Envoy from Mirror City, is quite mystical and concerns itself with her life as a writer in England, Spain, and New Zealand after her return. I didn't like that about this book at all.

An Angel at My Table: Alone, Naturally

She looks like the person who it is everything to and where did it take her I know more from her other books. That makes it attractive and personal for me. During the commentary and 'making of', Campion varies between saying the first and the second episodes are her favourites, though it is clear that the third is her least favourite.

Inevitably the high def version shows off the grain more vividly, but then it also shows the rich NZ colours celebrated in the film.

This is where the objects and subjects of ordinary life existing on the surface of a body of water is molded into the molten forms of fiction.
