Through these groups, Kaplan demonstrates, an enduring and influential model of the man of letters emerged in the first decade of the nineteenth century. They pondered William Godwin and Edmund Burke more carefully than they did candidates for local elections and insisted other Americans should do so as well.

Many residents fled to safer ground, and those who remained anxiously tried to avoid contracting a disease whose method of transmission was a terrifying mystery. Delineates the mutable character of, and complex relationship between, those broad political and cultural concepts. Imagining a different kind of citizenship, they founded periodicals, circulated manuscripts, and conversed about poetry, art, and the nature of man.

The individual analyses of these three groups are informative and insightful, and Kaplan effectively traces out the complex networks of writers, printers, and newspaper editors who drove an inchoate, expanding print culture. In the aftermath of the Revolutionary War, after decades of intense upheaval and debate, the role of the citizen was seen as largely political.
