Overseen and operated by the National Park Service, the sites at Manzanar, Tule Lake, and Minidoka were examined by NPS archeologist Jeff Burton and his team between 1993 and 1999, along with the seven other historic prison camps, as well as isolation and detention centers associated with Japanese American incarceration. As the war drew to a close, internment camps were slowly evacuated.

Through efforts of many within and outside of the Japanese American community, the Civil Liberties Act of 1988 was formalized. These photos by Miyatake demonstrate his genius behind the lens. Allowed to bring with them only what they could carry, people were forced to abandon their homes and the lives they had built over generations.
