According to Macaulay the necessitarian takes freedom to reside in, ... those distinctions which the mind frames on the essential difference which lies in those objects which present themselves to her perception, and which form the objects of her volition: else why have schools to train our youth in knowledge and in habits of virtue? Macaulay concludes: Therefore man, by being born with the necessary means, is born a creature apt for reason; and a creature apt for reason is a creature fit for society. Her model for a democratic constitution is a bicameral government made up of a senate and a house of representatives.
