About 800 women workers began a , going on daily marches. Although WAC enlistments never reached the high levels attained early in the war, recruitment maintained a steady pace from the fall of 1943 through early 1945, allowing the War Department to respond to overseas theaters' requests with additional WAC companies.

Women Munition Workers

The Women's Army Corps was successful because its mission, to aid the United States in time of war, was part of a larger national effort that required selfless sacrifice from all Americans. But after their selfless efforts during World War II, men could no longer claim superiority over women. Many domestic servants would have been redeployed to national service, but no exact figures exist.

I have seen specimens of some of the most 'advanced' work produced in a School; indeed, the delicate work of lens polishing and centring, the intricacies of engineering draughtsmanship, the precise art of tool-setting and gauge- making have become specialisms of the Schools in certain localities. Other women, wearing a distinctive armlet, were passing In and out between the rows of workers, now stopping and bending over a machine, now making some bright remark to the operator, as a ripple of laughter indicated, or again, pointing out in sterner wise some danger, or some error in the job.

The Women's Army Auxiliary Corps

Based in small part on a , but primarily a fictitious character, the strong, bandanna-clad Rosie became one of the most successful recruitment tools in American history, and the most iconic image of. It was also expected that women would give up work once they were married.
