Galba

In 39 the emperor learned of a plot against himself in which, the general of the legions, was an important figure; Caligula installed Galba in the post held by Gaetulicus. It is said that he was a heavy eater and in winter time was in the habit of taking food even before daylight, while at dinner he helped himself so lavishly that he would have the leavings which remained in a heap before him passed along and distributed among the attendants who waited on him. Some think that it was due to Titus Vinius, who had great influence at the time, and whose friendship Vitellius had long since won through their common support of the Blues.

One can only hope to read more such wonderful pieces in future! To these brigands, each with his different vice, he so entrusted and handed himself over as their tool, that his conduct was far from consistent; for now he was more exacting and niggardly, and now more extravagant and reckless than became a prince chosen by the people and of his time of life.

But since Galba openly declared that no men were less to be feared than those who thought of nothing but eating, and that Vitellius's bottomless gullet might be filled from the resources of the province, it is clear to anyone that he was chosen rather through contempt than favour. His elder brother Gaius fled from Rome and committed suicide because the emperor would not allow him to control a. Enrran Mahfuz is a poet and
