Munhwaō : the 'cultured language' and language branding in North Korea, 1964

As English loanwords began invading South Korea, so did English calques. New York: Mouton de Gruyter, 1992. Our language flows easily, with rising and falling inflections and long and short sounds; it has good intonation, as well, and sounds very beautiful to the ear.

Saliha Uysal

The article raises two main criteria for script ussōng: 1 does the language use its own script and 2 what type of character system does it employ. These claims, of course, have far-reaching undertones, as Ri is trying to prove that Munhwaō, a language spoken by only a few million people in one small corner of the world, is not only equal but superior to these internationally widespread languages. Even hwasul articles, however, do not escape the branding of North Korean communism.

Speech instruction in Munhwaō Haksūp comes in two categories: articles dealing with pronunciation emphasize correct pronunciation as based on Pyongyang speech and not Seoul speech; other articles center on using proper cadence and hwasul skills. Each situation demands a word that can communicate both the appropriate meaning and emotion for the idea being vocalized.

The typical length of an issue increased from forty-eight to sixty-six pages in 1981. By not only comparing, but proving point by point the ussōng of Munhwaō to the languages of the world, Munhwaō Haksūp is declaring Munhwaō to be the best, most superior language in the world.

Saliha Uysal

Munhwaō Haksūp claims that the Korean language has been a critical ethnosymbolic marker of the Korean people since the beginning of time. Some of these women had to have therapies and medicine. Contrary to common belief, no divine powers have been attributed to Kim Il Sung; the intense cult of personality, however, does lead to museums that feature chairs that he has sat in Myers 13.
