Mrs. Knight's Smartest Artists: Second Grade Connoisseurs

The picture is dated 1533 and would therefore just fit into the Zecchin-Serena chronology. Finally he pointed out that the expression vetro di trina lace glass was a creation of the nineteenth century. One piece of supposedly French filigree glass is illustrated in Exhibition Catalogue 'Depuis 3000 ans, du verre', which presents the collections of Le Musee du Verre de Charleroi.

Rockwell painting reproduction, The Connoisseur

The latter was to celebrate the virtues of Charles III, symbolised by the twenty-six figures on the balustrade. Collectors are a type of connoisseur.

Norman Rockwell made fun of Jackson Pollock by painting the same way

Caserta has been automatically compared with Versailles, and though it has fallen on evil days it remains majestic, solemn, austere, without pomposity - an extraordinary creation by any standards, eight hundred feet long, one hundred and twenty feet high, with four huge open courts and five floors. An extraordinarily gifted and beloved illustrator, Norman Rockwell began his career at a fortuitous moment: new mass-market magazines were flourishing, entering the homes of millions of American families. At the same time they became able to make any number of colors and to combine them skillfully into calcedonio marbled glass and millejori and mosaic patterns, to make filigree glass, iced glass and, by manipulation of the hot glass, to create fine and capricious detail, the like of which the world had never seen.

Fioratti has worked on architectural restorations, and restored a 10th century village near Siena. The January 13, 1962 cover of The Saturday Evening Post features an older man eying a painting that looks like Jackson Pollock at his most...drippy.
