The rejection of the Lab-Nat option by anglicised trade unionists and socialists—including Connolly—was the great strategic disaster of the 1890s; its result was not independent labourism, but depoliticisation. She resigned following the failure of a motion to be passed which would have brought the INLA under the control of the IRSP executive committee.

James Connolly

In 1913, during the general strike known as the , Connolly and formed a workers militia, the , to defend strikers from the police. The chapter on Henry George is the most novel part of the book, and redresses a glaring lacuna in previous texts mea culpa. Labourers in Dublin port stopped work.
