Book notes, Journal of Policy Analysis and Management

Educational Psychologist, 20 3 , 153—160. Although tastes, technological opportunity, and appropriability conditions themselves are subject to change over time, particularly in response to radical innovations that alter the technological regime, these conditions are reasonably assumed to determine inter-industry differences in innovative activity over relatively long periods.

The new professionalism: The synthesis of professional and institutional development

In response, governing boards and governmental agencies are devoting increasing attention to the management of higher education. As significant as the quantifiable group of people reached is the fact that by working in liaison with the administrators of the organizations where outreach programs were held, libraries began coordinating their information-handling capabilities with other community agencies. In 1966 no city of 100,000 or more population was committing more than 2 percent of its total municipal expenditure for support of its libraries.

Of course the homemade guides—usually called catalogs—say where the publications have been shelved. The library maintains some sort of record of the publications it receives, and it assists readers in discovering what they want to read. Each task force contained a children's library specialist, a young-adult specialist, an adult specialist, an audiovisual specialist, and a community worker.
