Although many books had mentioned various types of the species of Brownies, the earliest reference appeared in the 1818 book The Brownie of Bodsbeck written by James Hogg. If not, or if the cream was not fresh, the Brownies would leave the home forever or perform mischief. Úruisgs are sometimes described as half-man and half-goat.

A book may have more than one first edition in. The object of every household was to please the Brownies and not anger nor offend the creatures for fear that they would depart and therefore stop doing chores. Sikes goes on to explain that, in addition to being a household spirit, the Bwbach is also the name for a terrifying phantom believed to sweep people away on gusts of air.
