Globalization and the Nation

Since 1945, we have actively reduced our world political system to a dangerous mockery of what was designed by US president Woodrow Wilson and many others after the cataclysm of the first world war, and now we are facing the consequences. The global economy can be viewed positively because it has enhanced trade between states and thus the economy and interstate relations benefit. However, over the last thirty years, the welfare state has been under attack in many developed democracies.
