Education opportunities for people with learning disabilities

But not every young person with physical or learning disabilities is so fortunate; many face a postcode lottery, particularly when it comes to post-16 education. You can get copies in Braille and on audio tape from the Department of Education and Employment Publications Centre.

Love Life: resources for young people with learning disabilities

There are courses to help you move on to further education, to develop your workplace skills and help you to get a job, and to enable you to live more independently.

Education opportunities for people with learning disabilities

It is also important that the team works with the young person's parents and carers. Services for Young People offers young people with LDD aged 13-24 impartial information, advice and guidance on their post-16 options such as further education, training, employment and independent living.

Fortune College

That is why Sarah and her friends are supporting the campaign, which calls for students with a physical or learning disability to have the choices most young people take for granted — such as choosing a further education college that best meets their needs. Tel: 01223 316644 The Open University Offers a full range of degree and other courses, combining home study with tuition and group discussion at local study centres. Wootton also has its own stable yard and provides weekly riding therapy sessions for local children, up to the age of 16, with a range of special educational needs and disabilities.

Further Education

The idea for the campaign was developed by a group of student representatives who attend specialist colleges, with the support of NatSpec The National Association of Specialist Colleges , and has been launched ahead of the new Children and Families Act, due to come into effect next month. As Sarah's experience has shown, there is now the opportunity of a life fulfilled, and specialist colleges have a vital role to play. She hopes to become a waitress.
