Howells, William Dean 1837

If the self may no longer be considered the center of intentionality in an older, more positivistic sense, then we are left to inquire whether it still has value in discussions of literary theory. By showing how these and other nineteenth-century authors handled competing commitments to sociality and the individual consciousness, The Social Self offers an original and provocative reassessment of a fundamental American literary preoccupation and radically revises traditional and recent narratives of American literary culture. Her Aunt Josephine wrote to her grandfather suggesting that Lydia should come to Venice to live with her.

Each of these responses engages the children's works they discuss as important individual texts that valuably inform both Hawthorne's writing and various aspects of their cultural moment. That is, at certain cultural levels, these works have long been regarded as familiar and valued parts of the Hawthorne canon. The Sound the Stars Make Rushing Through the Sky: The Writings of Jane Johnston Schoolcraft.
