He has done as good a job as could be expected under very difficult circumstances. What we need today is stability with methods which keep Pakistan stable, not those that have worked for the States or Great Britain. Like many other people, I too am sceptical regarding his softly softly approach, where his nature and persona is the opposite - a military one, it may seem that the economic reform is a somewhat mirror of doctrines established elsewhere, places possibly where his new found friends are - America, UK? What we need is the rule of the wise, even if they are in small numbers.

What Pakistan needs is a government that represents the people be he a dictator or a prime minister. Khalid Rahim, Toronto, Canada How can such a deliberately skewed-up arrangement be considered a solution to the military dictatorship in Pakistan when even before the so-called elections the military junta had decreed that General Musharraf can dismiss the prime minister and parliament when he so desires? For Huriyat the Kashmir Valley is the Kashmir and it is ok for them if the Valley becomes independent or goes with Pakistan. For democracy to flourish, one needs strong democratic institutions like an impartial and vibrant judicial system; an electoral process that is not only transparent but is also autonomous; a multi party political system; devolution of powers at the central and state level even to the grassroots level.
