Proceedings of the Section on Survey Research Methods, American Statistical Association; 1999. Farrington 1995; 2006 suggested that the circumstances in which the family breakdown occur and the post-separation effects are the most important factors to consider when assessing the risk for juvenile delinquency. The results of the Cambridge study of juvenile delinquent trajectories showed that while boys from broken families are more delinquent than boys from intact families, they are not more delinquent than boys from intact but conflicted families.
