The defence of Verres was undertaken by Hortensius; the selection of Cicero as chief counsel for the prosecution by the democratic leaders was a public recognition of him as the foremost orator on the Pompeian side. One of his most famous quotes was one that he included in one of his earliest works. According to Barrow 1967, Herodotus' real failing in Plutarch's eyes was to advance any criticism at all of the city-states that saved Greece from Persia.

Terence's plays were more polite in tone, dealing with domestic situations. After Terence, he is the most distinguished and the most important in his literary influence among the friends of Scipio.

The six comedies had already taken the place which they have ever since retained as Latin classics. His work differed from those of the earlier annalists in passing over the legendary period, and beginning with the earliest authentic documents; in research and critical judgment it reached a point only excelled by Sallust.
