The turn of thought that must obviously prevail through a poem of this kind, it is as needless to point out, as to expect novelty from it would be unreasonable. Cold, speechless, pale, beneath these roofs recline, Trampled by slaves, by loathsome reptiles spurn'd; Silent the tongue so fondly deem'd divine, The head that counsel'd, and the heart that burn'd.

Ye that so often rouze the world to arms, And shake contending kingdoms to their base.

Rev. Thomas Maurice (1754

Fletcher and Prince, in Oxford, and J. Still lives each character thy pen pourtray'd: Thy numbers only feel the force of time, The features flourish, tho' the colours fade.
