The name developed into the imaginary General Ludd or King Ludd, who was reputed to live in like. Many of his male descendants gained comfortable prosperity as merchants and businessmen, while their wives and daughters led full lives as mothers of the large families in which education and refinement were encouraged.

Women were also found in large numbers in metalwares and pottery and in a variety of petty trades, especially in towns: confectionery, brewing and other provisioning, seamstressing, laundry work, cleaning and retailing. Over time, the term has come to mean one opposed to industrialisation, automation, computerisation, or new technologies in general.
