Strategies for sustaining and enhancing nursing students' engagement in academic and clinical settings: a narrative review

Medical help for treatment of chronic disease conditions is available to most older adults through Medicare and Medicaid.

Gerontological Nursing: Developing the Art and Science

Older adults have complex health care needs that require specialized knowledge that includes understanding normal aging and how age-related changes can affect the presentation of acute illness or chronic disabling conditions.

Improving knowledge and attitudes toward older adults through innovative educational strategies

The tag team is a small group, so the participation of the members in that team is maximal and active. Mean age of nursing students and clinical educators were 23 and 45 years, respectively.

Issues Affecting the Health of Older Citizens: Meeting the Challenge

The participants' experiences indicate numerous problems in nursing education including problems related to students, educators, and clinical environments. During the last fifteen years, significant reductions in hospital length of stay have produced a complex cascade of unintended consequences and burden for families caring for acutely and chronically ill elders.

Strategies for increasing gerontology content in nursing education (1990 edition)

Schwinn, BSN, RN; Shirley A. To prevent, or at least mitigate, the expected shortage of gerontological nurses in the US, increased recruitment of nurses to gerontological specialties must be initiated now. The outcome was the overall opinions of students regarding the characteristic of Q methodology and the class format.
