On cross-examination of Hewitt, the government elicited testimony regarding specific instances of Dawkins' good conduct: in particular, Hewitt was led to acknowledge various commendations that Dawkins had received while on the Jamaican force, as well as the fact that Dawkins had been injured in the line of duty. There was no intimation that the requested copies are confidential in nature by reason of public policy. Manglapus, it cannot escape one's eye that this case did not involve a question of separation of powers arising from a legislative inquiry, as in the case of the House of Representative's demand on President Washington for papers relating to the Jay Treaty.

White Linen Night

Wadlington was an employee of the Crown Social Hall, a club owned by Whiting that operated as a community center and, the government alleged, a center of drug distribution and money laundering activities.
