The SDM® Model in Child Protection

Each emergency or short-term task must be documented by the county of service in the KIDS Contacts screen. This data can then be analyzed to identify the services for which there was greater need than availability to procure more of them and the services utilized in the past only because there was not a better-fitting resource available. CEs are available for live and recorded webinars.

The department used this information to inform the trainings it regularly offered to mandated reporters throughout the state. We have observed a handful of agencies that are also performing sophisticated analysis to figure out which programs have historically been most successful for which families. Enroll: Are providers engaging every client in services quickly after a referral has been made? Seventeen data-driven strategies state and local governments are using to improve results for children and families. This book highlights seventeen management and delivery solutions that public child welfare and early childhood agencies are using to overcome the operational barriers that often undercut attempts to improve the health and wellbeing of vulnerable children and their families.

Decision making in child welfare services: intake and planning

Improve effectiveness of screening and investigatory decision-making through regular adjustments based on outcome analysis Within the bounds of their state policies, most child welfare agencies give hotline screening staff and safety investigators latitude in making decisions about when to screen in a call for investigation and when to remove a child for placement into foster care. Common elements of effective hotline systems Hotline elements support valid and reliable decision-making at the point of screening reports of child abuse and neglect.
